"As an architect," Mr. Neilson tells the Committee, "I would unhesitatingly condemn the whole building, from toundation to roof. It is defective and filmsy throughout, and in its present condition cannot be regarded as sail."

This positive statement, in view of the fact that the building has only been occupied since January last, astonished most of the members of the Joint Committee.

Mr. Neilson went on De specify further in detail the condition of the structure as he had found it. One evidence of its induty construction was the poor and cheap material that had been employed by the contractors. The loundation of the building, he said, was of a make shirt character, and that part which rested upon wooden piles was particularly insecure. Some of the piles were likely to decay very soon, and, in his opinion, the life of such a founda kin could not be hore than five.

The roof was not strongly enough supported; was not strongly enough the view of them if Architectors to long and with the strength enough the view of the piece of the first products to strongly enough the view of them if Architectors too long and with the middle products to long and to them if Architects too long and with the middle products to long and to them if Architects too long and with the middle products to long and to t than ten years, and probably it would not isst more than five.

The roof was not strongly enough supported; was in a bad and learly condition, and its present condition was extremely in affe. As a remedy for the defects in the fundation be would suggest that the entire floor of the main building be taken up, the wooden piles sawed off and masonry be placed upon them, thus practically bulleting a new roundation. The roof he also incuft would have to be entirely replaced. With a new root showed conditions the made to last for thirty years, but hardly longer than that.

The cost of these repairs he estimated at $150,000, but he stated that he would be glad to have the privilege of reproducing all the buildings on the Island for $400,000.

"It was a building," he decired, "that the dovernment should never have accepted as a clearly did not come up to the specifications. The omi slans amounted in all to about $1.700 in value and heat red as possible places and speaking-tubes."
